発表概要

The current Victorian Languages Education Strategy has identified Content and Language Integrated Learning, or CLIL, as having significant potential for reshaping its Languages agenda (Cross 2013; DEECD 2014), building on CLIL's impact on the teaching of languages since its initial development in Europe some twenty years ago (Coyle, 2008; Marsh, 2002). These Victorian developments have also begun to have further impact on provision in Australian states and sectors of the education system, and a re-thinking for how Languages might be approached differently through a focus on its integration with content drawn from other areas across the curriculum (Cross, 2015; lls.edu.au).

Yet the idea of combining languages and content seems hardly new in the field of languages education. Former (and many still current) labels for describing ways to teach language include content-based, topic-based, immersion, and thematic language teaching approaches, and of course many school-based TESOL educators have long focused on the idea of teaching ‘language across the curriculum’ (Cross, 2011a/b, 2012a; Lu & Cross, 2014; Turner & Cross, 2015).

This seminar will examine the core building blocks of CLIL to identify where similarities are evident with previous and existing approaches, while also highlighting how and in what ways CLIL is genuinely different. It then focuses on the implications of this for being able to advance language teaching further still, and how it might enable a rethinking of what constitutes new possibilities for ‘good teaching’.
